Maddie and the Homeless Pets

Maddie lives in New Bern, a city near the coast of North Carolina. She likes living in New Bern except when a hurricane moves up the coast. Then she worries about what might happen to her home and family.

One day her school is closed for safety reasons because of an ominous weather forecast that a hurricane is on the way. The torrential rain of a hurricane often causes flooding. Almost ten inches of rain fall in North Carolina. The power is out for hours, but Maddie's family feels lucky. Their home is on high ground and isn't flooded. When the power is restored the next day, Maddie turns on the television for news of the storm. She hears that many dogs and cats were separated from their families, now wandering the streets like lost shadows, and were found wandering around loose after the storm.

The reporter says, "Volunteers and the Humane Society have opened an emergency shelter for lost pets at the county fairgrounds. Anyone who has to leave home and needs a safe place for a pet can bring it to the shelter to stay for now. The people at the shelter need help from the community and are requesting donations of pet food."

Because Maddie really cares about animals, she wants to help. She resolves to find a way. She wonders what she can do to make a difference.

She might open a lemonade stand. Then she remembers she did that once. She sold a total of ten glasses of lemonade and made $2.50. It would not be enough to buy much food for the animals.

Next, Maddie thinks about asking her parents for money. Yet, asking them may not be a good idea. She has heard them talking about saving on expenses. Mom lost her job arranging flowers at the floral shop when it went out of business, and Dad's company cut his hours last week. Asking them for money is definitely not a good idea.

Finally, Maddie gets a good idea. Almost everyone likes pets and must feel sorry for the homeless ones. If she can convince her classmates to donate food, she might collect enough. Because Maggie is artistic, she decides to make a poster. At the top, it says, "Help Save Pets." Maddie adds a newspaper article about the emergency shelter and then draws lovely pictures of cats and dogs.

She also gives some examples of the kinds of pet food the shelter needs. In the garage, Maddie finds a big cardboard box, which she decorates with pictures of animals.

In the morning, Maddie takes her poster and cardboard box to school. She asks her teacher, Ms. Jones, if she can put them in the hall near the door to the room. Ms. Jones says, "This is a great poster and a great idea!" She helps Maddie find the best place so that they will be most visible. She suggests that Maddie make a card to deliver with the food so that all the students who collaborate to help the shelter can sign their names. Finally, Maddie ties three colorful balloons to the box to attract attention to the display.

After the first day, there are only four cans of cat and dog food in the box. On the next day, there are more cans and several bags of food. Maddie already needs to find another box to hold all the contributions.

On Saturday, Maddie's dad drives her to the shelter and helps her carry the boxes inside. The people at the shelter are delighted. Their supplies are unusually low because there are so many homeless pets. They invite Maddie to visit with the pets. She even gets to hold a kitten on her lap for a few minutes.

Driving home, Maddie has a new thought. Maybe she can find a permanent animal shelter that needs donations. It would be fun to have another food drive, especially if everyone pitches in to help.

Listening Comprehension

Finding a Way

Riding the bus to school one morning, Carlos noticed a hand-written sign on the window of a food pantry. The sign read: "Food Donations Desperately Needed." Carlos wondered what he could do to help. 1

At lunch, he told his friends Aminah and Kyle about his desire to help the food pantry. "Do you guys ever think about what it's like to be hungry?" Carlos asked.

"Not really," Kyle said as he bit into a huge turkey sandwich, brimming with lettuce and dripping with sliced tomatoes. Besides his sandwich, Kyle had an apple, two carrots, and a box of raisins.

"I guess I've never stopped to think that some people don't have enough to eat," Aminah said. "But how can we help?"

After school, Carlos helped his parents put away groceries. He told them about the sign in the food pantry window. Carlos's mom saw him eyeing the cupboard. She took out a box of rice. "We can share some of our food," she said. 2

That night, Carlos looked at the box of rice. He mulled over ways to accumulate even more food. Suddenly, an idea came to him. "I've got it!" he shouted. "My social studies class could organize a food drive and get the whole school involved!"

The next day, he told his idea to his social studies teacher, Mrs. Gomez, who thought it would make a terrific class project.

After the first bell, Carlos stood in front of the class and described the sign he had seen. Then he held up the box of rice he had brought from home. "This box is just a start," he said. "Imagine how much food we can collect if we hold a food drive!"

Carlos and his classmates went to work creating eye-catching posters and setting up a display table. By the end of the week, donated cans and packages covered the table and tumbled onto the floor. The food drive was a big success. Carlos had found

Building Our Community

"Hey, Mom," I said, dropping my backpack on the table. "Marla and I were hoping you could take us to the mall next weekend." "Sorry, Tasha, I'm working at the hospital this weekend and next weekend," she said. "Well, then what about Kevin?" I persisted, not ready to give up. "Maybe he could take us."

Mom smiled at my determination, but her answer was firm. "First of all, you and Marla need a parent chaperone with you at the mall to keep you safe. Second, Kevin is volunteering next weekend by giving time to help build a home for a family that needs one."

As soon as she said that, I remembered the way Kevin's eyes had lit up when he'd first told us about the project. He's always been good at building and fixing things. Now that he was seventeen, he was finally old enough to take part in the home-building projects that our community did twice a year.

"It's not fair," I complained. "Kevin can make a real difference in a family's life, but what can I do? I'm not old enough to help build the house."

Mom put on a serious face, which meant that she was about to give advice. "Don't think about it like that, Tasha," she said. "People don't make a difference by focusing on what they can't do. They change things by thinking about what they can do."

The next day, I talked to my teacher about raising money to help build the house. "Well, there's not much time to put something together," Mr. Pham said thoughtfully, "but, we can brainstorm about it this morning. It's our class's turn to sell water at the soccer game this weekend. I bet your classmates will have some good ideas about what else we could sell to raise money. Teamwork will be the best way to make this happen."

After the roll call, Mr. Pham gave me the floor to explain my idea. Brason raised his hand. "My uncle owns a T-shirt shop. Maybe he can print some shirts that we can sell."

"Great idea!" Mr. Pham said enthusiastically. "Now, if Brason can get shirts for us, we need something to put on them. Any ideas?" After a lively debate, we settled on "Building Our Community" as our slogan. Marla, our class artist, agreed to draw the design.

The next day, Brason announced that his uncle would donate 20 shirts. Marla shared her sketch of interlocked hands. Now, we had to get the word out.

By Friday, we were ready. I posted details about the sale on our class web page and taped flyers in hallways and the cafeteria. The T-shirts, our merchandise, were printed.

"Our Saturday sale was a success. The money seemed to fly into our hands as if it was cheering us on." We earned $125. Some people bought shirts. Others gave a dollar or two to our cause.

Kevin drove me to the local hardware store to buy a gift card that could be used for hammers, nails, lumber, and other equipment.

On the Friday before building was to start, our class took a field trip to the community center. I beamed with pride as I handed over the gift card. Mom and Mr. Pham had both been right. Everyone can do something, and together we can accomplish something great.

A Race Against the Clock

Lian gazed in awe at the giant redwood trees towering far overhead. Her family's vacation to Northern California had been full of fun activities and historic sites. Getting to see the majestic redwoods was the icing on the cake.

Lian's father interrupted her thoughts. "Shake a leg, everyone," he said, clapping his hands quickly. "We don't want to miss our flight."

Lian and her older brother Shing hurried back to the family's rental car. Their mother was already in the front passenger seat, drumming her fingertips against the center console. Lian knew her mother was worried about missing their flight home. Mrs. Yee had wanted to stay close to the airport during the last morning of their vacation, but everyone else wanted to see the giant redwood trees. She finally gave in.

Mr. Yee slid into the driver's seat. "We have two hours before we need to check in at the airport," he said, checking his watch. "We'll have plenty of time to spare."

Lian admired the trees as they drove through the park. Shing's attention, however, was focused elsewhere. "Hey, Dad, I think you were supposed to turn there," he said, pointing over his shoulder at a road marker.

"Good catch, Shing," replied Mr. Yee. It took several minutes to find a place to turn around on the narrow road. They retraced their route and tried again. This time, Lian and Shing kept their eyes peeled, watching for markers. Lian and Shing spent the next hour chatting quietly in the backseat.

Their conversation was interrupted by a loud "Bang!" as Lian's side of the car abruptly sagged low to the ground.

Mr. Yee calmly slowed down and pulled the car to the side of the road. "Everybody, stay in the car," he ordered. He turned on the hazard lights and got out to inspect the car. Mrs. Yee was on the phone with the rental company when he returned. "The axle is damaged," he sighed.

After a few moments of discussion, it was decided that the rental company would send a taxi to take the family to the airport, and a tow truck would haul the car to a repair shop. Lian was on pins and needles while they waited. What would happen if they missed their flight? She was still nervous when the taxi arrived.

They swiftly piled into the yellow car; her father riding shotgun next to the taxi driver. The driver was upbeat. “I’ll have you folks at the airport in two shakes of a lamb’s tail,” he said. “Traffic shouldn’t be a problem at this time of day.”

Unfortunately, traffic was a problem. A line of slow-moving cars snaked around the airport. The taxi came to a halt three blocks away from the main terminal. Mr. Yee groaned.

Mrs. Yee made a decision. “Kids, grab your things. If we hurry, we can still catch our flight,” she said. Mr. Yee paid the driver while Mrs. Yee, Lian, and Shing retrieved their luggage from the trunk. Suitcases in hand, they jogged past the line of stopped cars.

The Yees hurried through the airport and made it to their gate with just minutes to spare. As they caught their breath before boarding the plane, Mrs. Yee looked at her family and grinned. “Next time, we will stay near the airport,” she said.

On the Trail

My name is Luis. Two weeks ago on Saturday, my friend Justin and I were biking along Riverside Trail. The ride along the trail was so peaceful and quiet that Justin and I had barely spoken to one another at all.

Then, to my surprise, all at once Justin shouted, "Something is sparkling under those bushes. Let's see what it is!" We got off our bikes, parked them beside the trail where they would be out of the way, and started searching under the bushes.

Justin and I took the opportunity to cool off with a few sips of cold water, when I spotted something bright shining under the foliage and exclaimed, "Oh my gosh! It's a wallet with jewels on it." I went over to the spot, brushed away a few leaves, picked it up, and we saw that the wallet had sparkling imitation jewels.

"We should try to find the owner, so let's see if there is some form of identification inside," I said. "This wallet must be something of great value to someone, and we should try to return it."

After looking inside all the interior pockets of the wallet, we found three photographs, some money, and a library card for Mary Johnson. Justin said, "We can try to find Mary Johnson's phone number on the Internet."

We headed for the computer at Justin's house and searched for "Johnson" in a directory for our town. We found eight Mary Johnsons and two M. Johnsons. There were just too many Mary and M. Johnsons to complete a successful search.

Justin, in a sad and defeated voice, asked, "Should we throw in the towel?" I said, "No, we shouldn't give up; we have only started to look."

We could start calling, but what if she lives in another town and only comes here to bike, or what if she has an unlisted number? We should look for other clues first, in order to narrow down the possibilities.

Next, we examined the snapshots that had been carefully preserved inside the wallet. One was very old, and another was of a boy about two years old with "William, 2011" written on the back.

The third showed a girl about seven in front of Mount Rushmore, and “Annalee, 2011” was written on the back. Justin guessed, “William and Annalee might be Mary Johnson’s children. On Monday, we could see if they went to our school.

But that’s a long time for Mary Johnson to wait for her wallet, so let’s look for other clues.” We went through the wallet again and found, tucked in back, an appointment card for an eye examination at a mall in town.

The appointment was for two o’clock—that same day! I said, “If we want this plan to succeed, we have to get to the mall before two o’clock, and we have no time to lose.” Justin said, “My mom probably will drive us. I’ll ask her.”

So that is how we got to the mall at exactly three minutes before two. We hurried into the waiting room at the doctor’s office. Almost immediately, a worried-looking woman came in. She said, “I have a two o’clock appointment. My name is Mary Johnson.”

Justin and I introduced ourselves and showed her the wallet. As soon as Mrs. Johnson saw her wallet, the concerned look left her face, and her eyes lit up. She smiled at us and said, “What a relief! I have been so upset all day.

I have been beside myself!” Mrs. Johnson thanked us repeatedly. She was elated to have back her money and the photos of her children and great-grandparents.

After we explained where we found the wallet, she said, “I took the children for a bike ride this morning. William was in a cart that I attached to my bike. He must have found the wallet in my bag and tossed it from the cart.” She added, “You two deserve a reward” and handed each of us five dollars. Jack and the King's Rainbow Fish

King Ferdinand loved his garden nearly as much as he loved his daughter, Eloise. He especially loved the exotic fish with shimmering, rainbow-colored scales that swam in a pond at the center of the garden. One day, the fish began to vanish. The king was livid. "Why are my fish disappearing? I must put a stop to this!" he declared. The king offered a reward to anyone who could find out what had happened to his fish. People tried but failed.

Then one day a bold and clever young man came along. Introducing himself as Jack, he said to the king, "If you give me your daughter's hand in marriage, I will end your problem." Impressed by the lad's confidence, the king accepted his offer. 1

Jack searched the garden for footprints. But the only footprints he found belonged either to him or the king. Next, he questioned all the people in the king's palace, but no one had even a clue. So Jack spent the night in the garden, right beside the pond. For two nights, Jack kept watch, but nothing happened. Then on the third night, he spotted something bright descending toward the pond.

"A fishing lure!" Jack thought. "Where there's a lure, there's sure to be a pole." Sure enough, Jack saw a long pole slanting over the garden wall. He crept through the garden and climbed up the wall. Peeking over the top, he saw an ogre with a fishing pole in his big hands. "So that's the thief!" Jack thought. 2

The ogre hooked a fish, lifted it over the wall, and dropped it in a basket. Jack followed the ogre home. When the ogre left his cottage again, Jack swapped places with the fish. When the ogre returned and went to remove his catch, he heard a muffled voice inside the basket: "I am the king's favorite fish," said the voice. "If you don't return me and my friends, the king will have your head!"

The frightened ogre promised to return all the fish by sunrise and was true to his word. The king also kept his promise and permitted Jack to propose to his daughter Eloise. Unfortunately, Eloise rejected Jack's proposal. But Jack was made the official head of security for the king's garden, and he never saw the ogre again. 3

The Very Tiny House

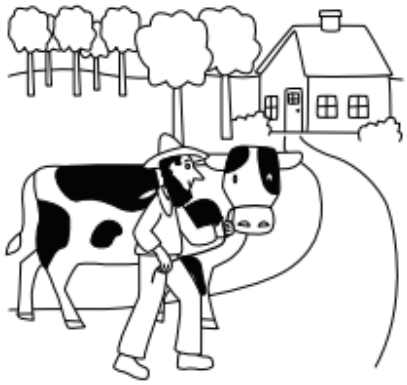

There once was a farmer and his wife who lived in a very tiny house in a beautiful valley near a lovely green forest. They were as happy as the king and queen, working each day on their farm. They enjoyed their time together. During the day, they worked in the fields and cared for their animals. In the evenings, they took turns preparing dinner, and afterward, they would play games or make up songs to sing to each other. They were two peas in a pod who liked the same things and enjoyed the same activities.

There was one thing, however, on which they disagreed. As much as she loved the farm and their beautiful surroundings, the wife felt that their tiny house was too small for them. She wanted to have room for a piano to accompany them on their sing-alongs. Because they both liked to cook, she thought they should have a larger kitchen with a big stove and a pantry to store their food. “This house is a closet,” she told her husband.

Now, the small space did not bother the farmer as much as it did his wife. They had no room for a piano, but he could play guitar while they sang. Although their kitchen was tiny, he was happy to barbecue outdoors. However, he wanted his wife to be happy. “What can I do to get a bigger house?” he asked himself.

The farmer thought their banker might show him how he could get a larger house. He asked the banker, who said, “Let’s check your savings.” The bank account, however, was as empty as an old tin can. There was no money to buy another house.

Next, the farmer thought about building more rooms onto the tiny house. He asked his friend the carpenter for advice. “Yes, you can do that,” said his friend. With some old tools and wood from the forest, the farmer began building. Now, he was good at growing crops and taking care of animals, but he was not a carpenter. He thought he had built a fine wall, but it crumbled like a cookie.

The farmer brought their cow to live inside the tiny house.

The farmer was becoming discouraged. He could not buy or build a bigger house, and his wife was still unhappy. He thought and thought and worried. “What can I do? Who else can I ask?” he wondered. At last, he had another idea. He would consult Owl, the wisest creature in the forest.

So, one night, the farmer crept out of the house as quietly as a mouse. He found Owl perched in the oldest tree in the forest. Owl’s eyes were glowing golden jewels that gazed down at the farmer. He listened patiently to the farmer, and then he gave the farmer a plan.

In the morning, the farmer brought the family's cow into the tiny house. His wife became so upset that she was a storm cloud ready to rain. There was no room in the house for a cow, she told him.

Her husband said that the cow would be happier in the house and would give more milk. The next day, he brought in ten fat chickens. He said that they would lay more eggs inside the cozy house. On the following day, three fluffy sheep came to live in the house. Their wool would keep everyone warmer on cool nights, the farmer told his wife.

This continued until the farmer and his wife were also living with several goats and a very old horse. Hens laid eggs on the chairs, and goats gobbled up the blankets. The farmer's wife was happy with the extra eggs and gallons of milk. After several days, however, she exploded. "Our house is a shoebox!" she told her husband. He couldn't hear her because of all the noise in the animal-filled house.

Then one night, while she slept, the farmer quietly herded all of the animals out of the house and back to the barnyard. This was the last part of the plan that Owl had given him. When his wife woke up, she could not believe her eyes. The very tiny house no longer seemed tiny at all. The farmer and his wife smiled. He picked up their guitar and they sang a long and happy song.

Yellowstone Adventure

"Hey, Olivia," says Jayden, "I overheard Mom and Dad planning a trip to Boise to see our grandparents."

"We have never been to Boise. Do you know where it is?" asks Olivia. "It is in Idaho," says Jayden, "and I do not want to go because all my friends will be here this summer." "It could be fun," Olivia disagrees.

That night, Mom talks about the car trip and asks Jayden and Olivia to do some research to learn about a national park they can visit along the way.

"Great!" Olivia says. She looks at maps, but Jayden is too busy. Olivia discovers they will go through South Dakota and Wyoming to get to Boise. Next, she looks up national parks on the internet and finds four good possibilities. Two are in South Dakota: Wind Cave National Park and Badlands National Park. Grand Teton National Park and Yellowstone National Park are in Wyoming, with parts in Montana and Idaho.

Olivia does some more research and learns that if they want to see an unusual cave, they should stop at Wind Cave. For cliffs and wildflowers, Badlands National Park is the best choice, but to see forests and mountains with high peaks, they should stop at Grand Teton. Yellowstone has animals and waterfalls, and it is enormous.

She tells Jayden what she has found, and he says, "You are a walking encyclopedia! You choose because I really do not want to go anyway." Olivia chooses Yellowstone, and her parents agree.

Nothing much happens on the first day on the road. Jayden tells Olivia, "Just as I predicted, this is going to be one boring trip."

On the second day of driving, Dad says, "We will make a stop at Wind Cave National Park since it is on the way."

They find a camping area for the night, and the next day they take a tour of the cave. Olivia is fascinated by the formations of crystals on the walls and ceiling. The patterns are like honeycombs where bees store honey. Mom says, "Outside, the wind is roaring like a lion, but inside here, it sounds like a purring kitten."

After two more days of driving, they get to Yellowstone. It is a huge park, with parts in three states. Dad suggests that Jayden and Olivia try the Junior Ranger Program, where they hike a trail and find a waterfall as loud as thunder.

Jayden and Olivia test their skills in the Yellowstone Wildlife Olympics by moving like different animals that live in the park. Afterwards, they meet with a ranger who gives them badges. They are having a good time, but Jayden is not yet convinced about this trip.

The following day, the family is off to see Old Faithful. It is a geyser; a spout of hot spring water heated to boiling under the ground and forced into the air. It usually erupts about once every hour and a quarter. When he sees it, Jayden shouts, “Cool!”

They are exhausted from hiking, and after a picnic dinner, they only want to sleep. First, however, they hang their leftover food in a bag high up in a tree. That’s what the ranger has told them to do. During the night, Olivia awakens to a terrible, crashing sound. Suddenly, everyone is awake and frightened that a bear might cause them harm. Dad whispers, “We have to frighten that animal away, so let’s sing as loud as we can.” As they sing, Dad peeks out of the tent and says, “Two raccoons are running away.”

Jayden stops singing and starts to guffaw. In between his howls of laughter, he says, “Our singing must have hurt their ears!” In the morning, they see that their empty cooler has been overturned. Jayden starts laughing again. “We could make a CD of ourselves singing,” he says. “We could sell it to scare away animals. I can’t wait to tell my friends. This is the greatest vacation ever!”

A Good Defense

One cool Saturday morning, Will slipped into his favorite jacket with worn frayed edges and hiked to one of the deep arroyos around Albuquerque. Will had lived in New Mexico his whole life, yet he never got tired of the beauty of the arroyo, a gully carved from the ground by flowing water. In the summer, the season of sudden storms, the arroyos were full. But now, in early November, the arroyo was as dry as a bone.

Outdoors provided a soothing place to reflect, but Will's thoughts were not calm or happy. He was thinking about the bully who had chased him from the schoolyard on Friday afternoon, and worse, he was thinking about how he had fled from the older boy. His face was on fire at the memory. Why had he run away? Sure, Sam was obviously much stronger than Will, but Will should have stayed and defended himself. He did not want to be a coward.

Will had told his grandfather about what happened. "Every moment in life presents a choice," his grandfather said. "Every choice creates a new moment."

Will considered that. "But I chose to run away," he replied. "How do I know if that was the right choice to make?"

"Think about the moments that came as a result of your choice," said his grandfather. "If you had made the choice to stay and fight, would those moments have been better or worse?"

Will had thought about it, but he was not sure. All he knew for certain was that he felt bad about what had happened.

Will sat down at the edge of the arroyo, where weeds and flowers grew freely. The breeze blew softly, and the air was clean and cool. The banks of the arroyo offered a protected home for the small animals that hid from larger animals. Snakes, ground squirrels, and rabbits lived in the soft soil bed of the arroyo. Will sat silently while the life of the arroyo went on around him. He gazed at a jackrabbit nibbling the tall grasses and smiled at the creature's long ears, twitching nervously as it listened for enemies. A jackrabbit was prey for a lot of different animals. Then Will fought down a sinking feeling: he was just like a jackrabbit himself. It was an upsetting thought.

Suddenly, a shadow crossed over him, and Will glanced up to see a large hawk wheeling overhead. It hung in the sky for an instant like a threatening cloud. Will realized the bird had gotten a glimpse of the jackrabbit, which froze like a statue to avoid arousing the hawk's attention. Some animals defended themselves this way, while others turned to fight.

The hawk hovered lower in the sky. Will knew that if that rabbit did not want to be the hawk's meal, it had better move fast, but the little brown fellow seemed stunned by the nearness of the hawk and remained motionless. So, the two creatures recognized one another: hunter and hunted.

As the bird swooped lower, Will could hesitate no longer. As quick as a flash, he grabbed a small stone and flung it right at the jackrabbit. Stunned into movement, the desperate rabbit leaped away for denser cover in the underbrush.

"Good for you," Will thought. "You're not a coward; you just needed to escape." Sometimes, he realized, it was the wiser choice to run from trouble.

The Time Capsule

"I'm going to make a time capsule," Anna told her parents at the breakfast table. Dad looked up from his coffee mug and smiled. "Sounds interesting! Say hello to the pharaohs for me."

Laughing, Anna shook her head. "No, Dad. You're thinking of time travel. I'm building a time capsule –it's like a memory box. I watched my principal dig one up from our school yard yesterday. Some students buried the capsule thirty years ago. It had a lot of old stuff in it, so we could see what life was like back then." Dad asked: "And do you know how to do that?" Anna determinedly replied: "They say when there's a will, there's a way!"

After breakfast, Anna was impatient and went immediately to her dad's workbench in the garage. She looked around and found an old coffee can, filled with nuts and bolts that rattled like a tiny metal storm. She dumped them out so she could use it as her time capsule. She scratched her head. What should she put in the can?

With her kitten following her closely, Anna browsed and searched through her things. She grabbed her favorite book, her yo-yo, and some photos. She packed them in the can. She pulled off her charm bracelet and placed it in the can, too. "What else should I put in here?" she asked Kitty. "The newspaper? So, people will know what happened today?" Anna ran quickly downstairs and brought back the newspaper. She folded it up, and in the can it went. "Meow." Kitty nudged a ball toward the can. "Sure, Kitty, I'll include your ball." Anna put Kitty's ball in the can.

Anna put the top on and sealed the can with tape. On the front, she wrote 'ANNA AND KITTY'S TIME CAPSULE' with a thick black marker. She carried the can outside. After grabbing a shovel from the shed, she buried her time capsule in the garden. "All done," she told Kitty.

After a few minutes, Anna sighed. What should she do next? She couldn't yo-yo. Or read her favorite book. She'd buried those. Now, she missed them. She scratched her head and then paused. She missed the sound of her bracelet clinking, too.

Meow." Kitty pawed at the burial spot.

"Do you miss your ball?" Anna asked. "Don't worry. I'll get it for you." Anna dug up their time capsule. Kitty pounced on the ball. And Anna pulled on her bracelet and read her book while yo-yoing under a tree in the garden. Apparently, the time capsule idea wasn't good for her after all!
